Sentence

It's possible for me to be a sunrise, now that I've had the time to think about it. In the summer, I would often wake up early in the mornings by accident, ^{How CAN you SHOW THIS?} the times ranging from 3-5 AM. When I woke up at those times, ^{SOUND IMAGERY / Personification} the earth finally seemed to be silent. ^{Personification} Peaceful, without the usual sounds of utter chaos. I would drag myself out of bed to walk outside, and look up at the sky. ^{Personification} It was always ^{VISUAL IMAGERY} like a child had spilt paints all over of it. Reds, purples, pinks, and even yellows would line the quiet sky; ^{Simile} the ^{TACTILE IMAGERY} wind blowing gently against me as goosebumps began to appear on my skin. ^{Personification} The sky didn't seem to judge my longing gaze, it kept on being gorgeous and freeing as the ^{SOUND IMAGERY} birds began to awaken. ^{Personification} Waking up this early had ruined my sleeping schedule, but I didn't care for all of that. ^{Cliche} I didn't have a single "care" in the whole wide world. ^{Personification} It was always worth it to see the freedom and beauty it had begun to hand me, willing it all into my shivering arms. So, I guess it would definitely be plausible for me to be a sunrise, if I thought about it. ^{Personification}
